Inky's Story

In 2014, Inky the Octopus was captured off the coast of New Zealand by a fisherman. The fisherman turned Inky over to the National Aquarium of New Zealand.

Inky spent two years in captivity at the Aquarium, spending most of his days hiding in his tank. Watching. Waiting.

Until one night in 2016, when Inky made a daring escape.

A small crack between the top edge of his tank and the tank lid provided just enough room for him to squeeze out. He stealthily squirmed across eight feet of open floor to a drain pipe that led to the ocean.

Inky made his way through 164 feet of drain pipe to freedom!

Rumor has it he may have headed straight for the Belize Barrier Reef - a perfect habitat to get lost in.

Although Inky's current whereabouts remain unknown, we like to think of him chilling off the coast of Placencia, enjoying his own Caribbean vacation.
